

As a personal and business DSL user in a rural area, I am opposed to your consideration of de-regulating broadband service.

Local, competent, entrepreneurial Internet Service Providers provide quality linkages to millions of broadband DSL users, and their ability to access reasonable pricing for me and others, their customers, would be jeopardized. It appears possible that the large phone companies could refuse to sell connections at all.

The system works, is made more innovative with small and local, competition! Don't try to deconstruct what can only do harm if de-regulated.

Thank you! Robert Jordan
